1400: Conversation Earth: As a young man, Rex Weyler joined early Greenpeace expeditions to document and stop commercial whaling. He went on to co-found Greenpeace International, and as a journalist has covered the subject of ecology extensively. In this newly released 2010 interview, Weyler shares his observations of what can happen as a civilization grows out of control. Rex Weyler has lived the life dreamed of by those who want to make a difference. As a young man he joined early Greenpeace expeditions to stop commercial whaling. He went on to co-found Greenpeace International, and as a journalist has covered the subject of ecology extensively. The human machine is just steamrolling toward disaster. Weyler has lived a rich life and has a keen understanding of the source of joy, but there is sadness in his voice when he talks about how civilization grew right past ecological limits to growth. 1430: Conversation Earth: Today it could be argued that human beings daily act against our own self-interests. How? Biologist Paul Ehrlich and fellow scientists tell us we are expanding our population and economy beyond the Earth's carrying capacity - at our peril. Why do we insist on continuing? Ehrlich has been a keen observer of human behavior for over 50 years, and he thinks we need a millennium assessment of human behavior. If we can understand how we behave, and why we behave that way, perhaps we can figure out how to behave as though we want to hang around another thousand years. Ehrlich is best known for authoring The Population Bomb, published in 1968 at the suggestion of the Sierra Club's first executive director, David Brower. Paul's wife, Anne Ehrlich, co-authored the book (though the publisher insisted only Paul's name adorn the book). Paul and Anne preferred a different title, Population, Resources and Environment, as the book was about much more than human population. The book offered dramatic warnings about the impact of the expanding scale of the human enterprise, which included not just the number of people on the planet, but also their behavior " levels of consumption and the size of their economies. 1530: Counterspin: A dramatic videotape of a 2007 U.S. helicopter attack was published by the website Wikileaks on April 5 prompting waves of coverage across the world, though only sporadic attention from the US corporate press. The attacks killed 12 Iraqis, including 2 journalists working for Reuters. Independent journalist Jeremy Scahill will join us to talk about the media reaction to the chilling video. Also on Counterspin today: As we record this show, efforts continue to rescue 4 miners believed still trapped by the April 5 explosion that killed 25 in West Virginia, and media are tracking the story. But if by ♦accident♦ we mean something unpredictable and that substantive steps are taken to avoid, is it time for reporters to find a new word to describe such disasters? We♦ll talk with journalist Jeff Biggers, author of Reckoning at Eagle Creek: The Secret Legacy of Coal in the Heartland. Archive 04-07-2010
